A New Look At Life After 50

Ten percent of Americans are now past 65. And by the year 2020, it's estimated that figure could rise to 25 percent.

That's a far cry from the dawn of the 20th century when life expectancy was only 47. By 1971, it was 71. And who knows what the future will be as medicine achieves new breakthroughs in killer diseases.

With longer life comes the need to make those years more secure. Buying insurance is one way. According to Colonial Penn Insurance Co., homeowners need one, in particular, should be aware of the need to upgrade insurance on their homes.

Studies show that many homeowners over age 50 bought their home 15 to 20 years ago. With increasing inflation, there is a need to review and where necessary, update the insurance coverage on these homes.

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, construction costs rose 123.8% between 1968 and 1978 alone. In fact the rebuilding cost of older homes in many areas has at least doubled. And if they're destroyed by fire or other calamity, unless the insurance protection has kept pace with inflation, many homeowners may have to pay thousands of dollars out of their own pockets.

Thus, a review of homeowner insurance is important. Make sure you shop around, though, because you may find that updating your coverage will cost no more than you're paying — and in some cases, the cost may even be less.
